

Problem Statement

University students are overwhelmed by too many class options, causing stress and poor course choices.

Students at current universities are often overwhelmed by the large number of classes offered, leading to unnecessary stress and poor course selections.

Who is experiencing this problem?

Students at the highschool level and above are likely to experience this problem in one way or another throughout their path through academia. It is an especially larger problem on the collegiate level however because of the strict requirements that classes are needed for, and the limited amount of elective credits available.

Why does it matter?

If students were to be assisted in helping find classes that would be more suited to their skills and interests, overall performance for many students would go up due to them taking classes more individualized for them, leading to more active participation, performance, and enjoyment by the students.
